Abstract: Globalization has had a significant impact on various aspects of life, including Islamic education. The development of technology and the unstoppable flow of information create new challenges for efforts to strengthen Muslim identity, especially among the younger generation. This research aims to analyze the challenges faced by Islamic education in the era of globalization and identify effective strategies to strengthen Muslim identity. The research method used is a library research with data collection techniques through literature studies, and participatory observation. The results of the study show that Islamic education needs to adapt to the dynamics of globalization through the development of relevant curriculums, improvement of teacher competence, and integration of Islamic values in educational technology. In addition, the involvement of religious communities and institutions in the educational process is also an important key in strengthening Muslim identity amid the influence of globalization. This research is expected to contribute to the development of Islamic education policies that are more responsive to global challenges.

Introduction

Globalization is an inevitable phenomenon in this modern era, where interaction between nations and information exchange occurs very quickly and widely. Globalization has affected various aspects of life, including culture, economy, politics, and education (Ahimsa-Putra, 2015; Mariyah dkk., 2022; Marjuni, 2022). One of the most significant impacts is the shift in values and identities among society, especially among Muslims.

In the midst of globalization, local and traditional values are often marginalized by the entry of culture and ideology from outside. This poses a challenge to Islamic education, which has played an important role in shaping Muslim character and identity. Islamic education is faced with the dilemma of maintaining authentic Islamic values while adapting to the demands of an increasingly complex era.

Along with the development of technology and information, the young generation of Muslims is now more easily exposed to various ideologies and lifestyles that may be contrary to the teachings of Islam (Fikri, 2024). This situation requires serious efforts to strengthen the identity of Muslims so that they are not eroded by the current of globalization (Nurjuman dkk., 2018). Islamic education must be able to answer this challenge by developing effective strategies in shaping and strengthening Muslim identities, especially through curriculum adjustments, improving the quality of teaching, and utilizing technology in the educational process (Syukron, 2017). Furthermore, Islamic education must also be a solid fortress in maintaining and instilling Islamic values in the midst of the rapid flow of globalization. Therefore, this research is focused on analyzing the challenges faced by Islamic education in the context of globalization and identifying strategies that can be used to strengthen Muslim identity.

This research can integrate the perspective of Islamic education with globalization issues, which have not been widely explored. A focus on how Islamic education can adapt and respond to the challenges of globalization, while still maintaining the core values of Islam, could be a new contribution in the literature. Many studies may have addressed Muslim identity in general (Amir, 2019; Azad, 2017; Duquette, 2015). However, this research can offer contextual and specific strategies based on the ever-changing global environment. How can Islamic education be applied effectively in different cultural and social contexts in the era of globalization? Focus on how digital technology and social media can be leveraged to strengthen Muslim identities through Islamic education, especially among the younger generation who are more exposed to global influences. By combining these elements, the research can make a significant contribution and be considered a new breakthrough in the study of Islamic Education and Globalization.

This paper integrates analyses from various disciplines, including education, sociology, and religious studies, to provide a comprehensive picture of how Islamic education can respond to the challenges of globalization. This approach allows researchers to offer strategies that are not only theoretically relevant but also applicable in practical contexts. Unlike previous research that focused more on curriculum adaptation or teaching methods, this study specifically focused on strategies to strengthen Muslim identity. This research explores how Islamic education can play a central role in building the resilient character of the young generation of Muslims in the midst of globalization, emphasizing the importance of integrating Islamic values in educational technology and daily life. As such, the study not only evaluates the impact of technology but also provides practical recommendations on how technology can be utilized as a tool to disseminate and strengthen Islamic values in the context of education.

Method

In this study, the research approach used is a qualitative approach with the library research method (Creswell, 2009). The data sources taken are writings such as journals, books and scientific reports that examine the topic of strengthening Muslim identity in the global arena. Meanwhile, the secondary data sources are taken from other scientific writings that have relevance and can help expand the analysis of primary data. Data was collected through observation and documentation, with qualitative analysis data analysis. Data is collected first, then selected and sorted then interpreted and analyzed so as to produce the analysis required in the research.

Results and Discussion

An Integrative Approach to Islamic Education and Globalization

An integrative approach to Islamic education and globalization is a strategy that combines the values, principles, and methods of Islamic education with the challenges and opportunities that arise from globalization. This approach aims to ensure that Islamic education is not only relevant in the era of globalization but also capable of forming a strong and adaptive Muslim identity. The Islamic education curriculum needs to be designed in such a way that it not only focuses on religious teachings, but also includes an understanding of the ongoing global dynamics. This includes issues such as technology, the global economy, the environment, and human rights, all of which can be integrated with Islamic values (Wahid & Hamami, 2021).

Digital technology can be used as an educational tool to teach Islamic values in an attractive way and in accordance with the needs of the younger generation (Adnas & Anjastri, 2022; Armour, 2023; A'yuni & Muhammad, 2023). For example, Islamic education applications, e-learning platforms, and social media can be used to expand the reach of Islamic education (Wadmany & Melamed, 2018; Zhang & Griffith, 2011). Islamic education can be integrated with other disciplines such as science, technology, art, and culture. It helps students understand how Islamic teachings can be applied in various aspects of modern life, including in their future professional fields (Fauzian & Fauzi, 2018). Universal Islamic values, such as justice, peace, solidarity, and togetherness, must be emphasized in education. This will help Muslim students understand that these values are in line with many principles of globalization, and can be used to bridge cultural and religious differences in an increasingly connected world.

Through cooperation with international educational institutions, Islamic education can adopt the best practices of the global education system while maintaining Islamic identity. It also opens up opportunities for constructive cultural exchange (Azad, 2017). Character education in Islam can be combined with values that are relevant to the era of globalization. For example, forming the character of students who are not only religious but also have high social skills, critical thinking skills, and adaptability to global changes (Fauzian & Fauzi, 2018).

The benefits of this integrative approach can make Islamic education remain relevant to the challenges and developments of the times. Helping Muslim students develop a strong and balanced identity, able to face the effects of globalization without losing their identity. In addition, the benefits can also prepare students to become productive global citizens, who are able to contribute positively at the local and global levels. Meanwhile, challenges in implementing this approach have surfaced. Some parties may reject change or integration on the grounds of maintaining the purity of Islamic teachings. The implementation of technology and the development of an integrative curriculum require resources that may not be available in all Islamic educational institutions. Maintaining a balance between maintaining traditional Islamic values and embracing new elements of globalization can be challenging. This integrative approach offers a dynamic and flexible way to respond to the challenges of globalization, while strengthening the role of Islamic education in shaping a generation of globally competent Muslims who remain firm in Islamic values.

Contextual Strategies in Strengthening Muslim Identity

The basic concept of strengthening Muslim identity focuses on efforts to strengthen and maintain a Muslim's identity in the midst of various challenges, both internal and external. Muslim identity includes beliefs, values, religious practices, and perspectives that are based on Islamic teachings (Azad, 2017; Berg, 2011). This identity strengthening aims to ensure that a Muslim can live in accordance with Islamic values in various life contexts, including in the era of globalization.

Strengthening Muslim identity is an ongoing process and requires joint efforts from individuals, families, communities, as well as educational and social institutions. With a holistic and contextual approach, Muslim identity can be maintained and strengthened in the face of various challenges of the times (Azad, 2017; Muttaqin, 2020). Contextual strategies in strengthening Muslim identity are approaches that consider the specific social, cultural, and environmental factors in which Muslim individuals or communities are located (Syukron, 2017). The strategy aims to ensure that efforts to strengthen Muslim identity are in accordance with the local context and challenges faced, while still adhering to universal Islamic values.

Before formulating a strategy, it is important to understand the social and cultural context in which the Muslim community is located. For example, in a country with a non-Muslim majority, the challenges are different compared to Muslim-majority countries. This understanding allows for the application of a more relevant and effective approach. The Islamic education curriculum must be adapted to local needs, integrating Islamic values with relevant issues in the local environment (Wahid & Hamami, 2021). This can include a study of the Islamic history of the region, the contribution of Muslim communities to local development, as well as the specific challenges faced by Muslims in the area. In culturally diverse communities, Islamic education can adopt a multicultural approach that respects differences and encourages intercultural dialogue. This helps to strengthen Muslim identities while also promoting peaceful coexistence with other communities.

The strengthening of Muslim identity does not only occur in schools, but also at home and in the community. The involvement of parents and the community in the educational process is very important, especially in instilling Islamic values practically in daily life. Media and technology can be used to strengthen Muslim identities by providing relevant and useful content according to the local context. For example, online platforms that offer Islamic courses with an approach tailored to local culture or apps that help Muslims live their daily lives in accordance with the teachings of Islam.

Youth are often at the forefront of facing the challenges of globalization (A. Hull dkk., 2010; Buckingham, 2008). Contextual strategies should focus on empowering Muslim youth with critical skills, leadership abilities, and a deep understanding of their identity as Muslims in the modern world. Extracurricular activities such as Islamic study groups, cultural clubs, or community-based social activities can be an effective way to strengthen Muslim identity, especially if they are tailored to local interests and needs (Fauzian dkk., t.t.; Yudiyanto & Fauzian, 2021). Adopting a dialogical approach in education, where students are encouraged to discuss and explore their identities in a global context, helps to strengthen their understanding of Islamic values and how to apply them in everyday life.

An approach tailored to the local context ensures that the strategy is more relevant and accepted by the community. Enabling the strengthening of Muslim identities that are appropriate to the specific challenges and opportunities in their environment. Involve the community in the process of strengthening identity, which can increase the sense of belonging and involvement in defending Islamic values. Meanwhile, the challenge in its implementation, namely facing high diversity, can be a challenge in designing a uniform but contextual strategy. Some communities may experience resistance to new strategies that are considered contrary to old traditions. The implementation of contextual strategies may require greater resources in terms of research, curriculum development, and training of educators. With a contextual strategy, strengthening Muslim identity can be carried out more effectively, ensuring that Islamic values remain relevant and able to adapt to various challenges that arise in the era of globalization.

Use of Technology in Islamic Education

Focus on how digital technology and social media can be leveraged to strengthen Muslim identities through Islamic education, especially among the younger generation who are more exposed to global influences. The use of technology in Islamic education has great potential to improve the quality of teaching, facilitate access to religious knowledge, and strengthen Muslim identity in the digital era (Albantany, 2021; Fayiz dkk., 2020). Technology can help address various challenges faced by traditional Islamic education, such as limited access, lack of resources, and the need to adapt to the times.

Technology allows for easier and wider access to Islamic educational resources, such as classical books, scholarly lectures, and online courses. This is especially important for those who live in remote areas or do not have access to formal Islamic educational institutions. E-learning platforms and educational apps allow for more flexible learning, where students can learn at their own time and pace (Wadmany & Melamed, 2018). Interactive features, such as videos, quizzes, and online discussions, can improve student engagement and understanding. Technology allows the creation of a curriculum that is more tailored to the needs of students, including the integration of religious science with modern knowledge. It helps in creating relevant and contextual learning approaches (Abas, 2018; Dwi Alfina & Hasanah, 2024; Syafitri, 2020).

Through social media, podcasts, and streaming videos, Islamic da'wah and education can be spread widely and quickly, reaching a larger audience around the world. It also allows for direct interaction with scholars and teachers from different parts of the world. Integrating technology in Islamic education also helps students develop digital skills that are essential for modern life, such as media literacy, programming, and data management. This ensures that they are ready to participate in a global society that is technology-based.

At the implementation level, it is not spared from the existing challenges. Not all students or communities have equal access to technology, especially in rural areas or developing countries. This digital divide can be an obstacle in the application of technology in Islamic education. With so much information available online, the big challenge is to ensure that the Islamic education content delivered is accurate and in accordance with Islamic teachings. This requires supervision and quality assurance from Islamic education authorities. While technology offers many advantages, over-reliance on technology can reduce the personal and interactive aspects of Islamic learning, which typically require direct interaction between teachers and students. The use of technology carries security and privacy risks, especially when it comes to students' personal data. Islamic educational institutions need to ensure that the platforms they use are safe and protect the privacy of their users. Technology has a significant role in the transformation of Islamic education, opening up new opportunities for the dissemination of knowledge and strengthening Muslim identity in the era of globalization. However, for the use of technology to be effective, a careful and strategic approach is needed, ensuring that technology is used as a tool to reinforce, not replace, the essence of Islamic education.

The Interaction between Muslim Identity and Global Identity

Muslim identity includes beliefs, religious practices, moral values, and culture that are based on Islamic teachings. It encompasses the spiritual, social, and cultural aspects that shape the identity of a Muslim. This identity is centered on faith in Allah, the implementation of worship (such as prayer, fasting, and zakat), and the application of Islamic values in daily life (Azad, 2017; Nasir, 2016). Many Muslims have managed to integrate their Islamic identity with a conflict-free global identity. They adopt global values such as social justice, human rights, and technology while still holding fast to Islamic principles. A Muslim working in a multinational company can apply Islamic work ethics, such as honesty and fairness, while still interacting with colleagues from different cultural backgrounds.

In some cases, predominant global values, such as secularism or consumerism, can be at odds with the teachings of Islam. This can create tension for Muslims in maintaining their identity (Bayat & Herrera, 2010). Issues such as unlimited freedom of expression, hedonistic lifestyles, or pressure to assimilate in non-Islamic cultures can be at odds with Islamic values, giving rise to internal and external conflicts. Muslims can adapt to global values in a way that is in line with the teachings of Islam. It involves contextualizing global values to fit the Islamic framework. Using modern technology such as social media to spread the message of da'wah, or applying Islamic social justice principles in advocating for minority rights in international forums.

In the process of Muslim and global interaction, it is not spared challenges. Secular and liberal ideologies that often dominate global discourse can be contrary to the Islamic worldview that integrates religion with daily life. Muslims need to develop critical understanding and strategies that allow them to participate in global discourse without sacrificing Islamic principles. Muslims, especially the younger generation, may face identity confusion when it comes to balancing being a "global citizen" and maintaining their Islamic identity (Ahmed, 2016; ES, 2023). It is important to develop educational programs that instill a strong understanding of Muslim identity, while also equipping them with the skills and knowledge to interact with the global world. Popular culture spread through global media often promotes values that are contrary to Islam, such as materialism or extreme individualism (Jurriëns, 2014). Muslims need to establish cultural filters that allow them to filter out popular cultural influences and only adopt elements that are in line with Islamic teachings.

It is important to implement strategies in strengthening Muslim identity in a global context. Islamic education should include an understanding of global challenges and how Islam can contribute to global solutions. This can be done by integrating Islamic studies with modern science and global issues. The goal is to build a generation of Muslims who are educated, faithful, and ready to contribute to the global community without losing their identity. Developing a strong and cohesive Muslim community that is able to support its members in facing global challenges. This includes economic, social, and cultural strengthening within the community. Encourage constructive dialogue between Muslims and other communities to build better understanding and reduce tensions. This dialogue can be a means to show how Islam contributes to global peace and progress.

The interaction between Muslim identity and global identity is a dynamic and challenging process. While there is potential for harmonious integration, there is also the risk of conflict and identity confusion. Therefore, it is important for Muslims to develop strategies that allow them to maintain their Islamic identity while actively and positively participating in the global world. With proper education, community empowerment, and cross-cultural dialogue, Muslims can navigate the complexities of globalization in a way that enriches both their own identities and those of the global community.

Conclusion

Islamic education plays a central role in facing the challenges of globalization, especially in strengthening Muslim identities. Through relevant curricula and focused extracurricular activities, Islamic educational institutions have succeeded in maintaining and strengthening Islamic values amid the influence of global culture. The identified strategies for strengthening Muslim identity include the integration of digital technology in teaching, the development of a curriculum that is contextual to global issues, and collaboration between schools, families, and Muslim communities. The use of social media and digital platforms as a means of education has had a positive impact, especially among the younger generation. However, challenges such as the influence of foreign media, modern lifestyles that are contrary to Islamic values, and identity fragmentation in the midst of a global society remain obstacles that must continue to be overcome. To strengthen the role of Islamic education in the face of globalization, it is necessary to develop a more adaptive and inclusive curriculum, which not only teaches religious science but also equips students with critical skills in navigating the global world. Collaboration between educational institutions, governments, and religious organizations is crucial in creating an environment that supports the strengthening of Muslim identities in the era of globalization. Overall, this study emphasizes the importance of Islamic education as a tool to strengthen Muslim identity in the face of the challenges of globalization. Through the right strategy and continuous adaptation, Islamic education can be a fortress of defense for Islamic values in the midst of the rapid flow of globalization.
